Discrimination: your rights
- GOV.UK

This form of discrimination, where a person is viewed as not worthy of protection is a basic violation of human rights (Townsend, 2006). The sad truth is that gerontologists like us were not surprised when policy makers, who, under extreme pressure to make good on a situation for which they were ill-prepared, simply forgot about the hidden population of institutionalised older people.

Discrimination and the abuse of human rights are immoral, unjust and illegal barriers to individual freedom and flourishing. Tackling them should be at the heart of conservative thinking and policymaking. However, conservatives are often considered to be sceptical of measures to strengthen human rights and tackle discrimination.
